construction is complete, the client is given a comprehensive orientation to the various building systems and how to maintain them.

"Each client provides us with a new experience. Some already have in mind the architectural style or type of products they prefer for cabinetry, lighting, plumbing, appliances and so on; and others come to us without any firm ideas. Regardless, it really doesn't matter to us because we take whatever time the client requires to assure they're comfortable with the end results."

Then we learned the process only got better. Mike is a firm believer in incorporating the sciences into building – using innovative building processes and technologies.

"What this means is that before any construction plans are drawn, we learn about the client's lifestyle, the functionality they want to derive from the home, and the topography and environment of the home site. We then determine the best construction materials and methodology to use to meet their objectives. Ostensibly, this is a huge investment by the client. We want to assure them of having a high-performance home; one that minimizes energy consumption and disruption to the environment yet provides all the aesthetics for the client's discerning taste."
